The Background

Meals and the habits of eating have undergone many changes throughout the long history of humanity. For most of human history, having food to eat was nothing that could be planned on with certainty. When there was food to eat it was another chance to live another day. The regular scarcity of food and water made humans very aware of how much we depend on forces out of our control in order to have food at all.

This is part of why Jews and Christians both have long traditions of thanking God for food and for meals, recognizing that we can eat and drink only because of the gifts that He offers through creation.

Meals were also always social events that occurred in groups or with the whole family. Meals often were occasions when important bonds were formed between differing groups, families, or peoples. Sharing a meal was a sign of mutual recognition of dignity and status. Hence, meals were always sacred moments between people.

For us as disciples of Jesus, meals are not simply about getting nourishment. They are seen as blessings from God, so much so, that we thank Him before and after we eat. Meals are a reminder of the great banquet of the Eucharist and of Heaven. Meals are a very important time to focus on forming bonds with the people around us who matter most.

Focusing on the faces of the people around a meal table, rather than on devices and screens, brings health and life to our relationships. That kind of focus takes real effort, but it is work that God always rewards and blesses.

- Talk about why it is so difficult to focus on the person in front of us rather than looking at a television, phone, or tablet.
- Talk about where our food comes from, and how God's gifts make our food and drink possible.
- Talk about what it means to share our food with those who have less than we do.
